To make it easier for potential buyers to help out with the cost of a new home, the U.S. House of Representatives is poised to pass a bill that exempts homes sold through cooperative real estate exchanges from having a 15% sales commission, a move critics see as jeopardizing private property rights. On Thursday, the House is scheduled to pass a bill sponsored by Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) that exempts community-supported housing organizations (CSHOs) and cooperative real estate exchanges (CREs) from the requirement that sales commissions be paid out of a dwelling's sale price. Ronald Derengowsky, a member of the board of directors of the National Coalition for Homeowners Preservation, which represents nearly 40 home builders and trade associations across the U.S., told the Washington Free Beacon he is not optimistic the Senate will follow suit. "My hunch is that it's a non-starter," said Derengowsky, who also heads the Derengowsky Group. "There's a lot at stake here for the real estate industry. It's bad enough when government says you can't sell your home for free. But if they require a company to get compensated, that's just wrong." Those who oppose the current bill contend it would shift costs away from real estate agents and others who contribute to the price of homes, and toward consumers who buy through these community housing models. CREs, for example, are economic development organizations that offer developers the opportunity to sell their homes for a set price. The bill comes as pressure is being felt from the Obama administration and members of Congress to get more affordable housing on the market. A recent report from the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) stated that two-thirds of homes listed on the market fail to sell. And 570a42141b
