“After ten years of being proud to be an American citizen, even at times being proud of our leader for building the strongest military in the world, I am ashamed to be an American today. My patriotism has been left in tatters. My idol, Obama, has let us down.” – Commander Marlon Almand, USAF, Veterans Today, March, 2015 A military Veteran who is no longer a member of the military is one thing. That is the stuff that gets attention. A retired military Veteran, who is not a member of the military, is another story. He is a person who has his own unique life story and it has something to do with his American citizenship. I have known Marlon for nearly twenty years. We met at a speaking event in Little Rock, Arkansas, at the University of Arkansas, School of Law, in the fall of 2001. I did not know it at the time, but Marlon was the Chief of the Command Staff at the U.S. Air Force Judge Advocate General’s School in the U.S. Air Force. Marlon is a person who made a conscious decision to become a general officer. It was a decision that he came to because he believed in the military and he wanted to make a difference. That same belief in the military is what led him to retire from the military. The American military was Marlon’s life for seventeen years. Marlon served his country, the United States of America, with honor and integrity for seventeen years. In the fall of 2000, Marlon was a lieutenant colonel and he was assigned to the Air Force Judge Advocate General’s School (AFJGS). He went through six assignments in the school and at the time of his retirement he was a captain and executive officer to the school commandant. The decision to make a general officer in the U.S. military is a monumental decision. The process is long and the cost is high. For Marlon it cost $50,000. All of that experience and all of that money paid off when Marlon was nominated for promotion to Major General, US Army, in 2005. Marlon was asked to stay on at the school and that request was denied. Marlon’s two terms at the school ended in 2005 and that was the end of his service to the U.S. military. Marlon did not take the money for being the Commandant
