Abstract The concept of duty has an established place in the American legal system. It has been regarded as an inherent and integral part of the law, which is reflected in both the judicial decisions and the many codes and statutes in existence today. Although the courts, as an institution, have taken a seriously reflective stance on the concept, the legislature and the individual citizen have not been equally progressive. For the most part, they have maintained a view which labels a duty as a legal obligation on the part of one party or a moral obligation on the part of all. These two modes of thinking represent the two basic ways that society approaches the relationship between man and society: legalism and sentimentality. However, the law is not static and neither are the public and private attitudes toward it. A fundamental change has occurred, and the change in the public view is reflected in the legal decisions which have developed. A change has been taking place in the concept of duty to a large extent under the influence of a series of decisions of this court. The goal of this thesis is to present the concept of duty as it is understood today and to suggest certain modifications which must be made in the law to achieve the full potential of the duty concept. response to immigration became central issues in this election campaign, and stymied the growth of a broad progressive alliance that would have offered hope for radical change. With these issues as the background, the Guardian's election podcast, hosted by Karl Moore,
